

If there's one thing that stands out about a new political group in Madison is the preponderance of union officials on the Common Sense Coalition. But Scott Vaughn of the Building and Construction Trades Council tells WIBA News...it makes sense considering one of the missions is fostering economic development. "We're concerned about some of the trends that have been taking place. There's a lot of job growth..but not necessarily quality jobs that can support families or provide for our future." 4,000 community members belong to the coalition...which leaders say will focus on issues important to the city, but won't endorse candidates for local offices.

Tuesday, June 7, 2005